Introductory Guide for the General Public

Trading and dating both involve uncertainty, emotion, attraction, disappointment, and decision-making under pressure. In both, success usually comes less from chasing excitement and more from knowing yourself, setting clear standards, managing risk, and learning from experience.

Educational note: This poster is for learning only. It is not personalized financial advice and does not tell you what to buy, sell, or trade.

The Core Analogy

Trading without a plan is like dating someone just because they are charming.

At first, everything feels exciting. You ignore warning signs. You make exceptions. You tell yourself, "This time is different."

Then, once emotions are involved, you try to decide your boundaries.

That is risky.

A written trading plan is like knowing your values before the date starts. It helps you avoid getting swept away by excitement.

In Dating

Healthy dating starts with self-awareness:

- What kind of relationship do you want?
- What behaviors are unacceptable?
- Are you seeking stability, excitement, commitment, or validation?
- Do you know your emotional patterns?

In Trading

Healthy trading starts the same way:

- Why are you trading?
- How much money can you afford to risk?
- Are you patient or impulsive?
- Do you panic when prices fall?
- Do you get overconfident after a win?

Key Lesson

Before entering the market, understand your own temperament. The biggest danger is often not the market itself, but your reaction to it.

Dating Version

A charming person is not automatically a healthy match.

You might ask:

- Do they respect boundaries?
- Are they consistent?
- Do their actions match their words?
- Are you ignoring red flags because of chemistry?

Trading Version

An exciting stock, crypto asset, option, or trend is not automatically a good trade.

You might ask:

- Why am I entering this trade?
- What evidence supports it?
- What would prove me wrong?
- Am I buying because of research or hype?
- Am I afraid of missing out?

Key Lesson

Excitement is not a strategy. Standards protect you from impulsive decisions.
