The Core Idea

Cancer is not one disease.

It is a large group of diseases in which abnormal cells grow and spread out of control.

Normally, the body has systems that tell cells when to grow, repair, rest, or die. In cancer, these control systems are disrupted by genetic and epigenetic changes—changes that affect how cells behave and how genes are switched on or off.

Everyday Analogy: A City With Broken Traffic Signals

Think of the body as a city.

- Healthy cells follow traffic lights, road rules, and stop signs.
- Cancer cells have damaged "traffic controls."
- They may ignore stop signals, multiply too quickly, invade nearby areas, and sometimes travel to other parts of the body.

Cancer begins when the body's normal regulation systems stop working properly in certain cells.

Why Cancer Matters

Cancer remains a leading cause of death worldwide, but outcomes vary widely.

A person's outlook can depend on:

- Cancer type
- Stage at diagnosis
- How early it is found
- Access to medical care
- Available treatments
- Overall health and support

Some cancers are highly treatable, especially when found early. Others are harder to treat, especially if diagnosed after they have spread.
